for Gerardo San Román and Miriam San Román Crowley a meditation on Paisatge amb figueres (Landscape with fig trees), the work of the sculptor Andreu Maimó

The place-names are the names of Maimó's ceramics and paintings, and of farms on the island of Mallorca, where my sister lived for some years after leaving Madrid. I first came across Maimó's work in a catalogue a few months after my sister's death. Even on the page, his life-size ceramic evocations of fig trees have tremendous presence. I had always planned to give my sister a fig tree, but between my ordering it from the nursery and its arrival in Pollença she died.

Fig tree in S'Horta Vella

An antique figure crouched in the old orchard her tough bark knuckled and fissured She has been standing there, how long?
More than a hundred years many hundreds perhaps And carrying a great weight——a hint of a raised arm, there where the shoulders would be and the invisible feet apart and braced

Lay it down, little sister Lay it down in the fig tree's shade and rest

Fig tree at Sa Galera

Did you think you were a caryatid that you could uphold the temple of the family?
You had such high hopes of putting up with it all, making light of the dark vault—our parents' house—but pain like a black knife gashed your side
And when you fell into darkness the house tumbled down around you

Fig tree at Son Sureda

These lopped branches gape like mouths voicing their silent prophecies too late.
Or the keening mouths of mourners.

How did we fail to guess that we would lose you remembering how more than once you were lost as a child?
Sat on the fish-and-chip shop window-sill in Cawsand and told to wait, then forgotten.
Left behind as a toddler lingering over the just-hatched chicks at the Ideal Home Lost to me at boarding-school when for the first time we stopped sharing a room

Fig tree at Sa Clota

Perhaps you were too small to remember her, our mother's cleaning-woman in Hornsea?
How did she wring out a cloth manage a broom, the Hoover?
I can still see that fist A knot of flesh and bone the industrial machine had sewn so well even the surgeons wouldn't unpick it Dense as a clot
No fingers left
A stump with only the memory of branches dancing

Trunk of fig tree from Can Vent

A cold wind blew through the house of an acrimonious marriage

Both sets of grandparents lived in the same town though hundreds of miles from us

Gerardo would say, some thirty years later, that we sisters were like two halves of the same coin

But one holiday they split us up wrenched us apart like this poor tree trunk leaving you, aged three, with our father's parents me with the kinder, poorer ones Indulged and cheerful, I didn't miss you, exactly, though it was lonely when I woke in the big bed. But you wept and pined night after night crying, not for our mother, but me 'She said I want my Amélie, my grandmother told me afterwards chuckling to herself Now, when I think of this a cold wind blows
And I call your name into the night

Fig tree at Firella

A mother and child of a tree.
And because the tree grows slowly the new growth is smoother-skinned more tender, reaching out to touch the rough coat of the weeping mother.

Our father has carried the sick family dog into the vet's to be put down.
We wait in the car and you are eight and I am ten and our mother's sobbing is more than we can bear.
I sit stiff with hurt, but you lean forward finger her sleeve and whisper kind, practical words; how we'll go to the library, and she can change her books and start to feel better.

We are unprepared for what follows.
It is not our mother who whirls round in her seat, this red-eyed, glaring witch's mask who screams at you and calls you wicked, hard, heartless. No. It is not our mother.
It is some thoughtless, selfish child, and you are the mother.

But that day settled into its silence like a large stone around your roots, a clot in memory's artery that blocked all recollection of that day and all the years that went before.

Fig tree at Son Estrany

How strange you've grown little sister wired and taut as a trigger A rifle ready to fire

While our father lay on the ground at Bisley lip thickening from the rifle's recoil as he aimed at targets across the heather you and I wandered finding harebells behind the lines—flowers of an unearthly blue each one solitary on its wiry stem that trembled at the guns' uproar and rang so faintly only you and I could hear them Back home we could keep the empty cartridges They stood on the shelf like a row of shining headless dolls

Fig tree at Ses Carritxó

Such wintry implications Like the old tree that grew on the north side of our garden in Marseille grey-skinned and sinuous whose figs were small and hard and fell to the ground for lack of sun before they ripened

Thursdays were jours de congé for girls of the Cour Bastide so we hid among the branches to watch the kids of the école communale at break the boys would chase long lines of girls their screams of joy (we knew we must never scream) a froth of petticoats that broke like surf on our silent wall

Doves, fig tree and walls

High walls, mute, shuttered windows:
La Cour Bastide
In the shady yard at break in the hubbub of strange language others chalked the grid of la marelle numbered the spaces 1, 2, 3 then halfway L'ENFER then 4, 5, 6 to the dome at the end LE CIEL Aiming the stone we ventured our small attempts with un...deux...cinq...six... awkward as geese on bumpy ground we tried not to land in hell Throw by throw words, whole phrases crept from between the lines trembled like lizards in the cracks of walls then flew like the stone from our throats Sometimes our words drew smiles as kind as the fig tree in the box-hedged garden of Madame la Directrice
—A toi le tour! —A moi? —Oui, oui Lance ta pierre! Vas-y!

But now you have thrown your stone far beyond these walls and I imagine it flying like one of Andreu's doves into that blue

Fig leaves I

Lobed and palmate glossy and pliant when young veined like our hands mapped with capillaries with life line and love line with what's done and what's to come The skin grows rough and mottled darkening, dotted with galls like liver-spots with pocks and clots and rings of rust fallen they stiffen like leather crackle underfoot, crumble in dust yet still retain the scent the whole tree has a musky pungency like no other

Even when burning the wood keeps its peculiar sweetness February, another fire, the smell of winter the mistral blowing out of a sky as blue as a glacier, freezing hands and faces Our father burned dead fig branches while we played in the old wash-house making those daft models in plaster-of-Paris—Snow White with dwarfs, Humpty-Dumpty—We learned how brittle our world was how fragile the things we make to love

Fig tree bark

that holds the shape of the tree green, still-living, with all your body's tender marks and creases your sad frown lines a hollow shape like our mother's dressmaker's dummy or like the bodice you wore as Princess Aurora in the Antwerp pantomime when your Principal Boy hacked his way through prickly cardboard to kiss you awake

We lived like Hansel and Gretel in a house with a thatched roof with geese in the orchard beside the Kapellen woods At night you'd wash your hair and wind it in bristly rollers then tie a jersey round your head When I crept to bed I'd find you lying on your back and gravely turbaned Once something about your stillness worried me so that I bent and kissed your cheek relieved to find you warm and breathing in your prickling head-dress

Spring in Santanyí

You named your daughter Miriam—wished-for child – rebellion – sea of bitterness
sees the tree re-awakening, sapling unfisting sun with green-gold hands risen from a pool of shade blue as Miriam's eyes Leaf-cases strew the ground like tired discs of confetti The girl stands and grows to summer fills her own space with her mother's musky fragrance

Box of figs

These fruits laid out like jewels glow like drops of blood like the babies you lost embryos in wrinkled sacs gilded with filigree purpling flawed and precious

Fig tree at Binifarda

Your needlework was a fig tree's autumn canopy—gold bedspreads with matching head-boards his-and-hers jerseys in auburn Fair Isle tawny mother-and-daughter outfits stitching the impossible web of life that death with one tug casually unravels

Fig tree at Son Mesquida just look at you trying to do ten things at once twisting your branches so as to hold on juggling three jobs almost dropping your filofax your body strained wrenched denying denying it determined to do it all carry on smiling and weeping all at once

Trunk of fig tree from Son Verro

It lifts up two broken branches

You showed us round the time-share villas that you sold— commission only—for Marriotts You were leaning like this fig tree at Son Verro fingering the pleats in your skirt like this ridged bark flushed with your sales-pitch as though your sister, nephew, nephew's wife were genuine customers and Marriotts a different employer from the one who never gave you a bottle of water never mind lunch—their sprinklers feeding lush lawns while the island shrivels

Sales-person for Nutricare you forgot real food swallowed the company line along with the slimmers' pap peddling dreams to anxious wives You who made the best pimientos del padrón, paella negra œufs à la neige

For jobs like these you strained and withered to this bitter wood

Trunk of fig tree from Ses Rossells

This tree is a grey-faced woman who struggles to her feet, one arm a broken branch hanging useless The wild fire on the hill you have escaped for now but you are tinder-dry this summer Terracing lies tumbled around you

Earlier we stood in the gloom of the cave wondering why we had come Inside, the usual debris human excrement, tissues, rusting tins a goat's skeleton picked clean by ants blackened stones of a makeshift hearth To please our father, find his fabled cave we had scrambled over boulders cut ourselves on razor-grass and now your arm is broken Two daughters in their fifties still trying to prove they are as good as the sons he wanted

We should have followed Vassilissa's example borne the goat skull home and let the darkness in its sockets blaze our rage, burn down the house

Fig tree at Ramonet Gros

What is it you hear?
Poised on one foot you're about to convene a residents' meeting clean the pool walk the dog cook for the parents, but something just off to the left tugs, and you lean distracted by this sound as by a strange beat in the car's engine a thudding in the ears Please do not listen Pay it no heed
It is only the three o'clock wind the wind in the cypresses you hear

their green skirts making tents of shade in a field of shimmering wheat. Surprised among it like creatures of another life—secret, mysterious, just glimpsed amid the daily plainness of grain—the pulsing pink of wild gladiolus and poppies' blood-red drinking deep of the fig trees' shade.

Fig leaves II

They have the exact colours of the ring I gave you for your twenty-first: moss-agate in a plain crown-setting in silver
You never wore it After you died your daughter gave it to me the metal black and tarnished Blue-green veins like moss branching round a reddish flame a clot of rust that might have warned you what that chest pain meant

I wear it always and the wearing of it keeps it from tarnishing My hands are freckled now with age My gift to you my own memento mori

Pollençan fig tree

Standing on the bend before Can Xura the finest fig tree in La Font.
Rustling a little as a moped passes dusty in summer yet drawing its water up from aquifers fed by rain falling on the Tramuntana, does it still bear fruit?

When our children were small there was always water at Easter time flowing in the Sant Jordi torrent; enough for children to dam with small rocks; a dazzle of water, enough for a pair of mallard and their brood to swim in below the little farm at the foot of the Vall de Ternelles.

Can Xura lies like an old dog in the sun beside the opening to the valley gorge blinking its œil-de-bœuf Moorish windows.
In the big kitchen Moor and Christian took the oath that gives the house its name to keep the peace and share the water

No water flows now along the conduits the Arabs built on top of the walls.
The iron gates to the valley are permanently locked to coaches of foreign walkers who once came every day.
More swimming-pools drain the aquifers.
The bed of the torrent is filling up with tyres and supermarket trolleys.

Only after a cloudburst does water flow in the Sant Jordi torrent. The fig orchards, the almond orchards are grubbed up. A dazzle of concrete hurts the eyes. The island grows dry.
The island we knew is dead, and so are you.
Does the sweetest fig tree in La Font still bear fruit?
